Kobe Bryant's Last Hurrah Tour comes to Brewtown!

Recently, retiring Los Angeles Lakers legend Kobe Bryant and his teammates came to Milwaukee and the BMO Harris Bradley Center to play the Milwaukee Bucks!

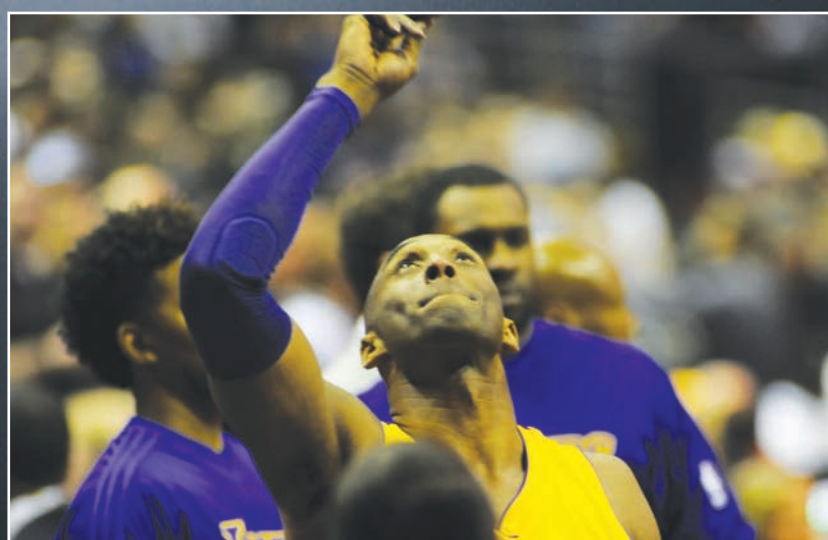

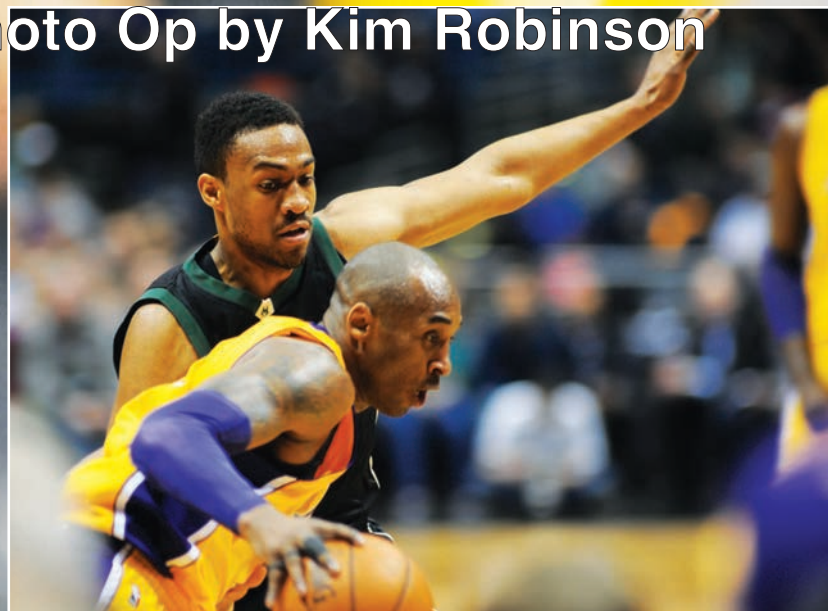

Bryant, who is one of the National Basketball Association's (NBA) greatest of all time, did his best to uplift his struggling Lakers team, but the Bucks, with its future stars--and potentially future great players--Giannis Antetokounmpo and Jabari Parker leading the way, beat L.A. Bryant had glowing things to say about Antetokounmpo a day before the game, saying the young Bucks player has the potential to be a great player if he works on a few things in his game.

Antetokounmpo must have heard Bryant's comments. He had his first "Triple Double": Double figure numbers in points, rebounds, and assists.

After the game the two players talked extensively, with Bryant sharing his thoughts and years of experience with Antetokounmpo; what the young Buck can do to improve his game.

You can bet it is a meeting Antetokounmpo will long remember.--The Editor

Mayor's Liaison to Transition to Fire and Police Commission

Clifton Crump Brings Management, Public Service Experience to Operations Manager Position

On February 29, Common Council Liaison Clifton Crump transitioned to the City of Milwaukee Fire and Police Commission (FPC) as its new Operations Manager. Oscar Tovar, Staff Assistant to the Mayor, will replace Crump as the new common council liaison.

Crump will be responsible for enhancing understanding and communication between the policies and activities of the FPC and the public. His duties include coordinating the development and management of programs and services designed to improve community relations, creating a strategic plan to enhance public information and educational efforts of the commission, and coordinating community outreach tactics to raise awareness of police and fire policies and practices.

Crump began working in the Mayor's Office in 2012 where he served as the primary liaison between the Milwaukee Common Council and Mayor Barrett, evaluated public policy matters related to proposed ordinances and resolutions, and engaged in constituent relations with community members throughout the City.

"Clifton brings professional expertise and a commitment to the residents of Milwaukee to his new position," Mayor Barrett said. "He has served my administration well the past four years and I'm confident he will continue to have a positive impact on the FPC's efforts."

Crump will continue his involvement on various boards and committees including the Milwaukee Center for Independence, Bronzeville Advisory Committee, Continuum of Care Executive Board, and the Black Male Achievement Advisory Board.

Before beginning his four-year service in the Mayor's Office, Crump spent four years working as a Project Manager for the Redevelopment Authority of the City of Milwaukee (RACM), where he assisted in increasing property sales of City-owned properties via improved ordinances, reconstructed billing policies that saved City resources and managed thousands of tax-foreclosed housing units and vacant lots.

"I am excited to welcome Clifton as part of the FPC team and even more excited that his new role will expand FPC outreach and education efforts," said MaryNell Regan, Executive Director of the FPC.

"Clifton brings valuable skills and relationships that are vital in moving new community involvement initiatives forward. Specifically, Clifton will create new public-private partnerships and provide a visible FPC presence to residents to promote access to and understanding of the FPC."

A native of Milwaukee County, Crump is a graduate of Shorewood High School. He studied at UW-Milwaukee, where he received a bachelor's degree in political science.

Decriminalizing School Discipline: Why Black Males Matter

By Tyrone Howard

--Article courtesy of edweek.org, posted March 10

Recent events in Ferguson, Mo., Cleveland, and New York City have ignited a series of debates about the lives of black males in the United States and how they are viewed in the larger society.

Regardless of what anyone believes, however, the reality is simple: Black males are disciplined and punished disproportionately more than any other group.

The historical narrative often depicts black males as violent, anti-intellectual, and resistant to authority. What needs to be understood, however, is how schools contribute to building this narrative, and what can be done to help change that. In many ways, young black men have a much lower threshold for engaging in inappropriate behavior while at school than their peers; overwhelming data show that black male students experience school in a very different way than do their nonblack peers.

The U.S. Department of Education's office for civil rights reported in 2014 that of all out-of-school suspensions of pre-school-age children, 42 percent were given to black children, compared with 28 percent given to their white peers.

The department also found that black males are three times more likely than their white male peers to be suspended and expelled, resulting in the loss of valuable learning time.

Moreover, it is not uncommon, as data from the Civil Rights Project at the University of California, Los Angeles, and the Schott Foundation have shown, for districts with small percentages of black males to report that this group still represents a majority of students being disciplined.

A study released in February by UCLA's Civil Rights Project identified, based on a statistical analysis of school districts nationwide, the most egregious records for unequal school discipline. Researchers discovered that states such as Mississippi, South Carolina, and Delaware, have strikingly disparate racial breakdowns in disciplinary actions.

The report cited in particular the state of Missouri, where unrest over a police shooting of a young black man continues to unfold.

The data show that, statewide,

Missouri elementary schools suspended more than 14 percent of their black students at least once in 2011-12, compared with only 1.8 percent of their white students. More specifically, the analysis indicated that the Normandy school district, where Ferguson shooting victim Michael Brown attended school, is one of the highest-suspending districts in the nation, with the overall suspension rate of black students close to 50 percent.

Nearly two decades ago, responding in part to the school shootings at Columbine High School in Colorado and other locations across the country, school officials adopted so-called zero-tolerance policies around student behavior.

The idea was that instances of disruptive behavior, violence, and possession of weapons on school campuses would automatically result in harsh and serious punishment.

This single policy opened the gateway for a grossly disproportionate number of young black males to be punished and subsequently excluded from schools. In time, infractions such as talking back, disrupting class, wearing hats, or listening to music on earphones could be cause for suspension or expulsion.

The practice in many districts became one of punishing defiance, not delinquency, which led to arrests and students' missing more time from school. More serious infractions, such as fighting, could lead to students' being referred to local justice systems, including children as young as age 10.

Minor infractions, which could and should be handled by school officials, began to result in the involvement of local police, the arrest of minors, and the filing of criminal charges.

Not surprisingly, the effects of school arrests can be debilitating for a lifetime.

A University of Chicago study revealed that high school students with one school arrest had a 26 percent graduation rate, compared with their non-arrested peers' rate of 64 percent.

The consequences of a lifetime with no high school diploma and a criminal record are clear, so how should schools, parents, and caregivers respond?

For school officials, the task is complicated, yet critical. Many districts are taking a closer look at disciplinary data to examine the race and gender breakdown of school suspensions and expulsions.

In Delaware, for example, district officials are taking a close look at school-by-school data, and drilling down further to look at specific teachers who have persistent records of referring students.

The goal is not to point fingers, but to identify which teachers disproportionately export and expel those they deem to be "problem students."

It is essential to help these teachers acquire the necessary skills and strategies to respond appropriately and in good measure to disruptive students.

An additional approach that districts can take is to adopt more restorative-justice practices, wherein students are not quickly punished and expelled, but allowed to reflect on their behavior and respond to their misconduct, with the goal of repairing harm done and restoring relationships among those affected.

This more caring and just approach offers a humane response that can shrink the school-to-incarceration pipeline that has become increasingly commonplace in many cities and states.

My own research with teachers of black and Latino young men and boys shows that the development and maintenance of authentic, caring relationships with students can help dramatically reduce disciplinary infractions. Perhaps most important, districts could benefit from having an open dialogue and professional development focused on persistent school discipline issues and the racial ramifications involved.

These conversations cannot be superficial, but must include discussion of implicit bias, racial micro-aggressions, schoolwide data on race and discipline, and deep-seated beliefs that many educators may have about black male students.

These often-unspoken, sometimes-unconscious beliefs include fear, cultural ignorance, ambivalence, or an outright preference for not teaching young black men and boys.

Last summer's events in Ferguson and other cities led to much national reflection, analysis, and conversation about the value of black lives.

The tragic deaths of Trayvon Martin, Eric Garner, Michael Brown, Tamir Rice, and Ezell Ford have opened the door to a painful examination of ourselves, our attitudes, and our actions—one that has been long overdue, yet desperately needed.

An important part of it must be about race, gender, punishment, and discipline. Now is the time for school personnel to enter the conversation to create more equitable and just learning environments for all students.

7 Lies We Need to Stop Telling About Young African-American Men

By Antwaun Sargent, courtesy of Identities.MIC.com, first posted April 08, 2014

1. There are more African-American males in prison than college.

African-American men are grossly overrepresented in the penal system; however, there are more African-American males in college than in prison, as of 2011.

Howard University professor Ivory A. Toldson found in his research that there are about 600,000 more African-American males enrolled in higher education than are in jail.

This myth has been used by education experts, the media and even the president, despite the fact that over the last decade, African-American boys have largely avoided the "school-to-prison" pipeline.

2. African-American males believe academic achievement means they are "acting white."

African-American males are not anti-intellectual. In fact, researchers have shown that African-American boys show more positive feelings toward school than do their white counterparts. University of North Carolina professor Roslyn Arlin Mickelson found, "Many black youth and adults express a high regard for education" and that there are a multitude of factors that shape black students' educational attitudes.

3. Less than 50% of African-American males graduate from high school.

The high school dropout rate for African-American males has actually hit a historic low. According to a 2013 Education Week study, about 62% of African-Americans completed high school in 2010 (the most recent year for which the necessary data was available), compared to 80% of white students. The increase represents a 30% narrowing of the gap between black and white high school students.

Indeed, African-American males are graduating at historic levels. According to the Schott Foundation for Public Education, "In 2009-10 the national graduation rate for black male students was 52%. The graduation rate for white, non-Latino males was 78%.

This is the first year that more than half of the nation's black males in 9th grade graduated with regular diplomas four years later."

At the same time, overall high school dropout rates have fallen steadily since 1990, and there is no indication that the rates won't continue to fall, given the trend over the past two decades.

4. African-American males don't go to college.

016-041/2-26/3-4-11-2016

1976 to 2010, "the percentage of black students [enrolled in college] rose from 9% to 14%. During the same period, the percentage of white students fell from 83% to 61%."

The Congressional Black Caucus report "Challenge the Status Quo," meanwhile, found that there are 12.5 million African-American adult males living in America, who make up 5.5% of the total population, and 5.5% of the students on college campuses across America are black male students. The percentage of black male students enrolled in college is proportional to the 5.5% of African-American men college-age or above living in the U.S. today.

5. African-American student-athletes graduate at higher rates than their non-athlete black peers.

Often college coaches boast about how teamwork and sportsmanship translate to academic success. However, according to a University of Pennsylvania report on black male student-athletes in NCAA Division I college sports, 50.2% of African-American male student-athletes graduate within six years, compared to 55.5% of black undergraduate students overall. And the disparity is even larger if black male student-athletes are compared to other student athletes: 66.9% of overall student-athletes graduate within the same six-year period, representing an 11.4% gap between black student-athletes and their teammates.

6. African-American male students have the same opportunities as their peers.

This is an important one, part of the narrative that allows casual racism like the kind experienced by Kwasi Enin. In fact, a recent U.S. Education Department's 2011-2012 Civil Rights Data Collection survey noted that the American school system treats African-American boys unfairly.

African-American male students receive a disproportionate number of suspensions, detentions and call-outs, and have a much higher rate of being expelled from school. In addition, schools attended by African-American males have less access to experienced teachers and advanced placement classes, according to the survey.

At the same time, the Casey Foundation recently found that African-American students face the highest barriers to opportunities. The foundation's researchers measured success toward 12 benchmarks, including literacy proficiency, rates of employment, income and several other factors. The report concluded that African-Americans, when compared to other racial groups using these benchmarks, fare the worst due to disparities they face from birth.

7. African-American male students are under-achievers.

Coded language and misused statistics have constructed this idea that African-American male students are underachievers. But ignoring the fact that some of America's brightest minds are African-Americans, recent research shows that a lack of critical feedback and demonstrated high expectations is stifling black confidence in the classroom.

In three double-blind randomized field experiments, researchers at the University of Texas found that African-American students improved their grades after having the assignment expectation reinforced by their teachers.

These results point out that a cycle of mistrust and lower expectations is a likely culprit in cases of African-American underperformance.
